Subject: Submission to the Joint Select Committee on Future Gaming Markets

Dear Members of the Committee,

The addiction of some personalities – particularly weakened ones such as abuse victims etc – to gambling in any form is unquestionable.

Making these facilities (which are often accused of being psychologically ‘rigged’ anyway) available to people in a social (club, pub etc) environment is like throwing fish into a cattery. And the fish are poisoned

We have amongst us many victims of abuse, and many addictive personalities – in fact I believe that the two together would be a majority, in any honest census.

Surely parliament is morally bound to protect these people? Or is it more politically expedient to throw them to the wolves?

Your actions on this matter will certainly speak louder than words – either way.

Yours sincerely, Bernard Turvey
